For the best way to get the most out of Photoshop, read how-to books and tutorials. Photoshop comes with learning curves and learning curves are steep. If you have years of experience with Photoshop, you may appreciate the learning curve and realize that it's easy to become unnecessarily confused by the capabilities of a program that has grown to include dozens of options and features. If you're just getting started in Photoshop, skip the chapters in this book that cover the most common Photoshop tools and techniques. If you're coming to Photoshop from an image editing program such as Fireworks or Corel Paint Shop Pro, the chapter on image editing fundamentals at the end of this book should get you started on the right track. ## Understanding Photoshop Image File Formats If you're familiar with computer files, you may have a pretty good idea about how images are represented. You may know that image files are made up of pixels, and a pixel is a dot that represents a color shade in an image. Although pixels cannot be edited, they can be set to any color shade. The color shades used in Photoshop are called colors. If you use a `_color swatch_` tool, such as the one in the Color Picker window that opens when you first open a new image, you can quickly find a color swatch or sample of a particular color.

Q: Is it possible to return IQueryable from a repository? I have a layer of abstraction on top of a repository pattern here. How would I write the GetAllOwner() method to work with IQueryable instead of IEnumerable? public IEnumerable GetAll() { return _dataContext.GetTable(); } public IQueryable GetAllOwner() { // return the _dataContext.GetTable() as IQueryable, instead of IEnumerable. } A: Yes, but in my opinion, you shouldn't do it. It will make your code more complex than necessary and it's very confusing. The IQueryable interface is an implementation of the IEnumerable interface. Your method should return an IEnumerable, and then call ToList() to convert the IEnumerable to an IQueryable. So, your method would look something like this: public IEnumerable GetAllOwner() { return _dataContext.GetTable().ToList(); } If you want to keep your repository as simple as possible, just return the data and call ToList() yourself. Q: Preventing cross-site scripting in RIA services I'm using RIA services with C# for an ASP.NET page. While doing the validation of the xml data I have mentioned that the data coming from the server side is expected to be pure xml. Now I'm getting the data in the format of JSON object. I'm facing several cross site scripting issue because when javascript is present in the json object the javascript is being executed. Now I was wondering if there is any solution possible for the above issue or i'll have to do data cleaning (changing the json object) from that point of time. Please help me with the right solution. A: As you know, JSON objects can be JavaScript scripts or executed at the client side, and passing raw JSON from the server can be very risky as the content can be accessed directly. So, first of all, my advice is to redesign your app in such a way that raw JSON is no longer necessary, and you can move to a better format. Or, your existing code should already be safe because, when validating the raw JSON, you can
