When a Former Star Inventor Lives the Dream Share: For the past six years, the Ask a Physicist series has featured some of the most brilliant minds in the world, learning, teaching and mentoring aspiring physicists in universities around the globe. This week, we revisit one of our favorites: Robert Nirschl, a key player in one of the most ambitious physics projects of recent times: gravitational wave astronomy. Nirschl is currently a professor of physics at Washington State University, where he leads the Gravitational Observatory (GEO) collaboration. He's been a key figure in the development of the three gravitational wave detectors currently in operation around the world: the LIGO interferometer in Hanford, Washington (NASA's Dawn spacecraft, too, relies on LIGO's laser beam to keep an almost continual watch), the Virgo interferometer in Pisa, Italy, and the GEO 600 interferometer at the Max Planck Institute for Gravitational Physics in Hanover, Germany. Nirschl, along with colleague Joseph H. Taylor of Louisiana State University, was
