In Python documentation I read Note, however, that the with statement will raise an exception if the block raises an exception, whereas the with_context() will silently continue without recursing into the block. And in this context I've found with `with_redis` and `.with_redis`. Are there any difference in performance (for production use), especially in async context? A: 1) Performance: The "with" statement is executed in the same thread as the surrounding code, whereas the `redis.RedisClient`

Support Accessible Books. Ask HN: How do you write the article titles? - jtfairbank I try to write an article on HN, and every few days I end up with something that's just a little bit better than the last time, and I feel bad. It's like each week I should have started a new post with a new title, but instead I write the same old rubbish over and over. Anyone who's had this problem can you share how you've solved it? ===== verdverm I agree with you. It's a big source of anxiety for me. To
