As you know, this is the guy who was innocent of the crime he was convicted of, not because of a DNA results or anything like that, but because Skakel's family was extremely wealthy and was able to afford the best legal representation money could buy, and his family members and friends really bribed the justice department officials to win the conviction. The legal system was not above breaking the law, as this article from last week's New York Times details: "To this day, even after his release from prison, Mr. Skakel remains the most famous inmate at the facility, with the average prisoner rarely exposed to the glare of the media. Mere minutes after the governor granted him a reprieve and freed him from the Greenwich maximum security prison on April 30, 2006, for example, he was the center of attention at a ribbon-cutting ceremony for the new $58 million state prison a few miles away. 'I'm glad they had to hold me down,' he joked, 'because they were starting to give me the electric chair.'" Michael Skakel is one of five people to be exonerated of the murder of Martha Moxley in 1975. He won his last court battles last year. He will now live out the rest of his life with his family on his 1,000 acre family estate in Greenwich, Connecticut. Mr. Skakel's son, Thomas Skakel, recently told the New York Times that the New York Court of Appeals' decision to overturn his death sentence created "a financial burden" for his family. Mr. Skakel was released from prison after spending approximately 17 years behind bars. It has been roughly 11 years since he has been out of jail. Mr. Skakel apologized to his mother the morning of his release. Thomas Skakel has said that his father was diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome. He has also said that his father has had lots of seizures. I�

OBJECTIVE A growing body of evidence suggests that low-grade gliomas (LGGs) are more heterogeneous in vivo than previously thought. The purpose of this study was to develop and validate a methodology for the analysis and classification of LGGs in vivo using dynamic susceptibility contrast-enhanced (DSC) MRI. METHODS Patients with LGGs (WHO grade II, n = 67) and healthy control subjects (n = 26) were studied. An image analysis and classification algorithm (IAC) to identify LGGs in vivo was developed using standard image processing techniques. The use of the proposed method was investigated using three-dimensional (3D) T2-weighted (T2W) gradient echo (GRE) MRI acquired prior to and following DSC perfusion-weighted imaging. Histograms of relative cerebral blood volume (rCBV) and relative cerebral blood flow (rCBF) were computed to identify rCBV and rCBF thresholds, which were then used to train and classify LGGs in vivo. The performance of the IAC was assessed via internal cross-validation and comparison with a current clinical practice-based classification algorithm developed by the authors (the algorithm presented on the WHO website). RESULTS The mean rCBV and rCBF of LGGs were found to be significantly higher than healthy controls (p
