With spray-coating and adhesive dispensing units, attempts have been made to improve the process by adjusting the nozzle opening width, the coating or adhesive amount dispensed, or the like in response to a control signal which depends upon the current application cycle and thus upon the amount of material which has been applied during the preceding cycle. The previous attempt to achieve improved process control by means of the spray-coating process used a piezo-electric control for adjusting the distance between the nozzle tip and the part being coated. However, the previous process control was designed for the adhesive dispensing process which, because of the higher viscosity of the adhesive, required a different frequency of the control than that in the spray-coating process. Consequently, the period of time of the cycle in which the nozzle is open, and thus also the control period, was previously determined in correspondence to the type of fluid spray being dispensed. For example, in adhesive dispensing, it was required to determine a period of time which was as short as possible, while for spray-coating it was necessary to take into account that, during the actual spraying process, when the leading edge of the upper nozzle opening is almost touching the part being coated, the nozzle opening is open for some time, and this time represents a definite proportion of the time of one cycle. This is made clearer in the light of the fact that the lower nozzle opening is open for the same period of time as the upper nozzle opening. Consequently, with conventional devices, it was necessary for the spray-coating process to take a longer time (specifically until the nozzle gap has nearly reached the point of no overlap with the part being sprayed) than the actual coating time in e79caf774b
