It is likely that further studies will find that different taxa of EVs produce different types of regulatory cargo, which may make these vesicles more or less effective depending on their targets. The best characterized example of cell-type specific EV release of regulatory cargo comes from malaria where the same mosquito-produced parasite vesicles, called P. berghei ookinetes, are found to be highly effective in early ookinete invasion of mosquito RBC, but display much reduced transmissibility when transferred to human RBC ([@bib22]; [@bib4]). The same is true for P. falciparum ookinetes that produce in vitro ring-stage parasites with different levels of host cell invasion capacity ([@bib23]). The population of EVs from the different ookinete stages (round, elongate and branched) can be mixed prior to transfer to human or mosquito RBC, suggesting that they are produced simultaneously. However, the individual vesicles may carry specific cargo from the respective ookinete stage as demonstrated by their differential sensitivity to ribonuclease treatment and differences in the regulatory cargo they deliver ([@bib4

bronchial effects of pulmonary
rehabilitation: a
controlled study.
In patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary
disease,
pulmonary
rehabilitation has been shown to improve exercise
capacity and reduce

breathlessness.
We investigated
whether the
bronchodilating
effect of exercise
depends on the presence of dynamic obstruction, or vice versa. The procedure
involved
randomization
into 1 of 2 groups.
The dynamic

group received saline inhalation, and the control group received inhalation of bronchodilators. The 2 groups then received isotonic exercise (greater than or equal to 20% of predicted maximal oxygen uptake), with inhalation of saline or bronchodilators as described. After the exercise trial, albuterol was administered only to the dynamic group, whereas ipratropium was administered only to the control group. At baseline, there were no differences between the 2 groups in terms of ventilatory pattern, exercise performance, or ventilation-perfusion mismatch.

However, only 10 of 14 dynamic patients had dynamic obstruction, as assessed by a difference in the functional residual capacity between spirometric and

single-breath
nitrogen washout
techniques.

Significant
reduction in airflow

obstruction was observed during
the exercise trial
in the dynamic
group, whereas it
was unchanged in
the control group.

Compared with the exercise trial at baseline, the post-exercise dynamic airflow obstruction was significantly reduced ($p = 0.03$), whereas the post-exercise obstruction in the control group remained unchanged. All 15 dynamic patients had a significant improvement in exercise performance, whereas the 2 control patients had no benefit from bronchodilators. At baseline, ventilation-perfusion (V/Q) inequality was observed in 9 of 14 dynamic patients but none of the controls. During exercise, there was a significant decrease in the V/Q inequality in dynamic patients (from 2.17 +/- 0.3 to 1.86 +/- 0.3, p = 0.04), but not in controls (from 2.12 +/- 0.5 to 2.15 +/- 0.6, p = NS). (ABSTRACT TRUNCATED AT
