Transfusion-related acute lung injury. Transfusion-related acute lung injury is a relatively uncommon but serious complication of blood transfusion. The diagnosis and management of this condition pose challenging problems for the clinician. Many of the signs and symptoms are similar to those found in other pulmonary diseases and unusual in this clinical context. Many clinical laboratory studies are not readily available on an urgent basis and molecular immunoassay techniques have not received widespread approval for the diagnosis of transfusion-related acute lung injury. Until further comprehensive, randomized controlled studies are completed to provide guidance for a definite answer, at this time no clinical practices regarding diagnosis and treatment of transfusion-related acute lung injury can be relied on to a sufficient degree of certainty.// Copyright 2009 the Sputnik authors.
